YONKERS

YONKERS, "a city of homes," is situated on the left bank of the incomparable Hudson, seventeen miles distant from the heart of New York City, and adjoining the northern boundary of the mighty American metropolis. Possessing all the requirements of a well-governed city, together with unexcelled natural advantages, Yonkers has been chosen as a home by many who have won fame in the literary, artistic, legal or commercial life of the adjacent great center of achievement.

Three regular lines of steamboats plying the waters of the Hudson River touch at Yonkers, and three railroads pass through the city, all combining to afford a peerless transportation service to the residents. The New York Rapid Transit Subway enables a citizen of Yonkers with but one change to reach the lower end of Manhattan Island in an incredibly short time.

Although Yonkers is not generally classed as a manufacturing city, the immense carpet mills, the hat factory, elevator company, sugar refinery, etc., give to the community a needful and healthful proportion of virile industrial life.

The present enrolment of scholars in the public schools is over 9,000, and no city in the Union can do more for its young. According to the State Superintendent of Instruction, "Yonkers demands of its teachers the highest qualifications of any city in the State."

The social life of Yonkers is on a high plane. The city abounds in splendid homes. Beautiful churches and trim-looking club houses are an assurance of an earnest and well-to-do membership.

Yonkers is thoroughly a modern city with a population of over 50,000 and an assessed valuation of about $45,000,000. It has been built permanently, without any startling booms liable to sudden collapse—a steady growth due to the genius and enterprise of its public spirited citizens. Its superb location is a guarantee of future increase in population and wealth.
